Now, good reader, if this be the unhappy plight of your own garden, it is time to change your factics; and though it be late in the season, you can begin now. You need not wait natil another spring before you begin the work of improvement. To be sure, you cannot prevent the growth of these pests, that may already have taken place, but you may prevent their ripening seed for another crop; and, moreover, you may turn this growth to some account in improving your land.

This is the way to dispose of them: COTTAGE NO. 2. Clean out your garden, removing as far as possible, every weed, root and hranch, but do not leave them scattered all over the surface of the ground. Hyon do they will be very apt to take root and grow. Besides, if left exposed directly under the sun, their fertilzing values will be wasted, for the greatest part of their substance will decompose and escape by evaporation. The best way is to gather them into heaps, and cover with a little diri, and leave them to with a little diri, and leave them to decay. This will leave the ground clean, and it will remain so much longer than it otherwise would; and they will assist to improve the soil which their growth has helped to impoverish.—Rustic, in Canuda Farmer.

THE PEAR TREE BLIGHT .- The blight shows itself on the pear tree in several different ways or with different degrees of malignity; sometimes it is localized in the limb, for which the remedy is thorough amputution; sometimes the epidermis will become black, while the inner bark appears all right, and the tree can be saved by removing the discolored part, when a new and sound bark part, when a new and sound bark takes its place. The only standard I have left was affected in this way some years ago, and is now a sound tree, producing fruit. Another form of the blight appears to be a vitiated condition of the sap, for which I sup-pose there is no remelly. Persons who have trees that turn suddenly black in midsummer are apt to suppose the disease comes on at that time; but I apprehend a careful examination will always show an unsound condition of the tree several months beforehand. — Cultivator.
